Per the item: The County of San Diego remains committed to working with Mexican authorities to improve conditions for these Communities.

The usual procedural wording plus flowery words [ie, elevated linguistic isolation and poverty rates] to create the facade a strong effort has been made to ending this environmental dilemma, yet, this egregious issue has not been effectively addressed in decades.

Missing in this item: holding Mexico accountable for the harm and damage done to our community, county and country.

It is good to have money in-hand for the IBWC U.S. International Sewage Plant repairs. Hope it doesn't get pulled pack, like the HHSA grant.

I really wonder how much of this would have been solved if we the people had fixed this on our own instead of begging for outside help and funding. Just the notion of multiple agencies each with its own power-play agenda and inter-jurisdictional competition (not intramural, BTW) makes me cringe. No wonder so little has been done. They're busy fighting each other over who does or doesn't do what.

House filters: you could have done this long ago. Same with tracking down toxic fumes. So yes, the emergency needs to be continued.

However, we also need to rely more on the good people of San Diego and the other cities involved.
