as a mother, advocate, and survivor of severe postpartum depression. My lived experience is my expertise I know firsthand what that feels like. Just yesterday, I was in court standing beside a mother who had battled postpartum depression, and I wasn't allowed to speak because I'm not considered a "professional."I cannot support this grant acceptance unless it includes a neutral person with lived experience in every room where decisions are made — whether it's policy design, program review, or community outreach. Because right now, these programs are led almost entirely by institutions that have historically failed the same women they claim to serve. If the County truly wants to achieve equity, it has to stop tokenizing and start partnering.Real change happens when professionals and lived-experience advocates work together one provides the data, the other brings the humanity before approving this item, make a commitment to include a neutral lived experience representative at the table.

So, another equity-based grant after you have shown time and time again that, when your feet are to the fire, equity does not matter. And this perinatal health grant shouldn't pitting Black newborns against Hispanic, Asian, Native American or any other newborns, and there are now alot of White newborns too who need these services.
