Managing the fleet as a coordinated enterprise asset rather than a collection of separate departmental inventories makes sense, although one must be cautious in taking vehicles away from emergency services.

However, I do not think that GPS trackers are needed. They may be expensive to acquire and install. I think that we can rely on manual logs to give us the same info for now.

It also appears that County staff have already researched this issue and identified that 104 vehicles could be removed from the fleet, so why not do this and go from there?
